Simplifying Occupational Health for Providers and Employers

According to the U.S. Office of Personnel Management, most Americans spend at least 30% of their time at work. And based on the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) workplace health model, conducting physical exams for workforce health and well-being is critical. Having access to workplace health solutions make it easy to stay compliant and keep employees safe, healthy, and productive.

Challenge

Administering timely, cost-effective, and convenient occupational health services places a significant burden on employers, including:

- Meeting examination program demands, including scheduling, tracking, physician medical reviews, administering insurance and more.
- Identifying certified clinics within the employee's home of record.
- Completing candidate exams, vaccinations, and other medical services.
- Implementing consistent medical examination standards.
- Ensuring compliance with healthcare and patient privacy laws and regulations, including HIPAA.

Moreover, the consequences of self-performing medical exams include extended absences, delayed candidate onboarding, and increased productivity loss.

At the same time, doctors and providers lack relationships with businesses in their communities. This creates a missed opportunity for both providers and employers who could use their services. Additionally, providers and medical facilities frequently encounter frustrations related to administrative issues, like missing information or components necessary for candidate evaluations – adding to processing times.

Providers and employers need to find a more cost-effective, timely way to ensure access to trusted, quality occupational healthcare. Acuity Provider Network solution can help.
